#1 Flippin' Burgers, Stockholm

The way Americans clamor for Swedish meatballs at Ikea is similar to the way Swedes queue up for a taste of Jon Widegren's Flippin' Burgers in Stockholm.

Widegren is serious about his burgers — so serious that he wrote the book about them: Flippin' Burger, in which he shares his "no secrets, no shortcuts" philosophy of burgerdom. All Widegren's beef is grass-fed, sourced from local farms, and ground in-house. A nearby bakery provides the buns. Flippin' doesn't take reservations but that doesn't stop fans from coming, leaving their names, and waiting to be called to place an order for one of the six burgers on the menu (one of them made not with meat but with cassava flour, kidney beans, and chipotle chiles). The basic burger here is described as "For the pure of heart. Meat and bread. Nothing more." Wash your burger down with one of 40 beers offered, along with wine, cider, and some hard stuff.
